

The Scandalous God: The Use and Abuse of the Cross.

By Vitor Westhelle. Fortress, 192 pp., $22.00 paperback.

AMERICAN MEDIA consumers are fed such a steady diet of scandal that it's hard to imagine anything being universally considered scandalous anymore. The church, too, is well practiced in the art of domesticating scandal, especially the disturbing news of a crucified Savior.

So argues Vitor Westhelle, who wants to make the scandal of the cross both shocking and transformative once more. Westhelle, professor of systematic theology at the Lutheran School of Theology in Chicago and formerly a minister and professor in his native Brazil, demonstrates a vibrant mix of Lutheran, Latin American and liberationist sensibilities.

He has two main foci. In his first four chapters he offers a historical summary of the cross motif and of attempts at its domestication. The last six chapters are thematic, exploring the implications of a theologia crucis for various contemporary concerns. The book's strengths and weaknesses roughly correspond to this division.

Westhelle is most helpful as he traces how the church, from its earliest years through today, has sought to evade the brute fact that the cross was both divinely intended and revelatory. How could God die? And such a scandalous, ignoble death! Inherited assumptions and imported frameworks are predisposed to explain the cross by explaining it away, by interpreting it as an unintended if perhaps also unavoidable consequence of some other, more noble divine activity. The ancient heresies of Docetism and Ebionism sought to evade the scandal by using logic that is, Westhelle claims, echoed in some modern liberal and feminist theologies.

Current debates over the presumed violence of vicarious atonement and the call to replace it with nonviolent theories exemplify such evasion. Proponents of the latter kind of theory typically claim that God did not will the violence of the cross or use it to effect reconciliation—that the violence was merely the consequence of Jesus' prophetic refusal to back down before worldly power.

To Westhelle's mind, such efforts to maintain God's blamelessness effectively shield God from involvement in pain and death. For the dispossessed of the world, to claim that God has not intentionally embraced suffering and death implies that they are Godforsaken and beyond redemption. Yet Jesus' life and ministry are nothing if not a reversal of the world's expectations and values: born in lowliness, serving the marginalized, proclaiming the last first and the first last as a sign of the eschatological in-breaking of God's reign. In the trajectory of this paradoxical logic, Christ's crucifixion becomes "the really privileged place where apocalypse happens." God is powerful

Reviewed by Robert J. Sherman, who teaches theology at Bangor Theological Seminary in Maine

Living the Questions

PREJEAN

QUESTIONING CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Questioning Capital Punishment with Sr. Helen Prejean is a five session DVD study featuring one of the world's leading authorities and outspoken critics of state-sponsored execution.

All proceeds from the sale of Questioning Capital Punishment will benefit the Death Penalty Discourse Network.

Available at www.livingthequestions.com enough to surrender all power: this is the subversive message of the cross, which is foolishness to those who are perishing but God's true strength to those who are being saved.

Westhelle writes evocatively, aware that he is dealing with a subject that must not be pinned down. Being too precise would be another form of domestication. Here, too, he echoes Luther's rejection of worldly philosophy, with its allure of systematization, sublimation and control. The distinctiveness of theological discourse—in contrast to the semantic realms of earthly regimes—is that it “is closer to poetry than philosophy; it invests itself more in rhetoric than logic.”

True to this description, Westhelle's style is dynamic and varied. He is engaging in typical academic theology one moment and quoting Brazilian poets the next; apparently undercutting “left-wing” theologians one moment, drawing on Foucault the next; citing a 17th-century Mexican nun one moment, Alice Walker's Celie the next, and then—in rapid succession—Jan Patocka (a Czech dissident who died under police interrogation), Wendell Berry and Rainer Maria Rilke.

Often this impressionistic approach reveals unexpected and eye-opening juxtapositions. At other times it simply seems disjointed. In the latter part of the book Westhelle falls into a trap that he says a theology of the cross should prevent: excessive abstraction. For example, in the chapter “Cross and Eschatology,” he insists that faithfulness to the biblical witness requires us to grasp how space and time are understood in scripture—but rather than turning to concrete exegesis, he braids his exposition together with ideas from the works of two novelists, Tillich, a seminary student, Anthony Giddens, Tzvetan Todorov, Karl Löwith, Hegel, Schleiermacher, Mircea Eliade, Rudolf Bultmann and others. The upshot? Westhelle gets far too caught up in the arcane preoccupations of certain intellectual circles. Yet flashes of insight continue. Westhelle does not so much build an argument as he strips arguments away so that readers may be scandalized into seeing again.

BookMarks

A Short History of the Twentieth Century.

By Geoffrey Blainey. Ivan R. Dee, 384 pp., $26.00.

This is not history for dummies. Writing with great sophistication and grace, Blainey weaves together the momentous events of the 20th century with insights into what life was like for common people and the effects of new technologies and medical advances. He is not content simply to narrate what happened; he also points out the often ironic consequences of historical events. Appropriately enough, he ends the narration with the resurgence of Islam and the terrorist attacks of 9/11. Blainey, an Australian historian who has taught at Harvard, might be faulted for being too Eurocentric, and yet it was Europe, along with the United States, that shaped the 20th century for good and ill. Although the book has no footnotes, Blainey includes selected resources for each chapter at the back.

Finding God in a Tangled World: Thoughts and Parables.

By Juris Rubenis and Maris Subacs. Paraclete, 184 pp., $19.00.

Juris Rubenis is pastor of the Martin Luther Church, a fast-growing congregation in Riga, Latvia. Before the collapse of the Soviet Union he was already a public figure, having taken a lead role in Helsinki-86, a human rights organization. Rubenis has developed a ministry with young adults in a post-Marxist society through the use of almost koan-like, pithy sayings in the form of parables, stories and aphorisms: “Reverence for reality spells the end of atheism.” “The world makes crèches to make amends for the real Bethlehem.” “The world devises pretty crucifixes so that Christianity can base itself on something beautiful, not on something monstrous where you see the evil of the world.” This collection of his sayings has sold hundreds of thousands of copies in Latvia.

My Name is CHILD OF GOD... not “THOSE PEOPLE”

A First-Person Look at Poverty

JULIA K. DINSMORE

This personal and provocative look at poverty in America is shaped around the author's own engaging stories, song lyrics, and poems. “You will be uplifted and blessed by reading what she has written.”

Millard Fuller, Founder of Habitat for Humanity

978-0-8066-5624-3 160 pp paperback $13.99

Ending Poverty A 20/20 Vision

A Guide for Individuals and Congregations

NANCY E. MAEKER and PETER ROGNESS

“A powerful, promising, and doable strategy for turning all the discussion, all the agendas, and all the proposals into action, grounded in faith...”

Alan Loose, Lutheran Social Services of Minnesota

978-0-8066-8003-3 112 pp paperback $10.99

Augsburg Books
An imprint of Augsburg Fortress

At bookstores or call 1-800-328-4648 augsburgbooks.com

Copyright and Use:

As an ATLAS user, you may print, download, or send articles for individual use according to fair use as defined by U.S. and international copyright law and as otherwise authorized under your respective ATLAS subscriber agreement.

No content may be copied or emailed to multiple sites or publicly posted without the copyright holder(s)' express written permission. Any use, decompiling, reproduction, or distribution of this journal in excess of fair use provisions may be a violation of copyright law.

This journal is made available to you through the ATLAS collection with permission from the copyright holder(s). The copyright holder for an entire issue of a journal typically is the journal owner, who also may own the copyright in each article. However, for certain articles, the author of the article may maintain the copyright in the article. Please contact the copyright holder(s) to request permission to use an article or specific work for any use not covered by the fair use provisions of the copyright laws or covered by your respective ATLAS subscriber agreement. For information regarding the copyright holder(s), please refer to the copyright information in the journal, if available, or contact ATLA to request contact information for the copyright holder(s).

About ATLAS:

The ATLA Serials (ATLAS®) collection contains electronic versions of previously published religion and theology journals reproduced with permission. The ATLAS collection is owned and managed by the American Theological Library Association (ATLA) and received initial funding from Lilly Endowment Inc.

The design and final form of this electronic document is the property of the American Theological Library Association.